The Puppet and the Dwarf is a quite brilliant unveiling of humans as perversions (one and all) by means of Lacan's reading of the Freudian division in the human psyche. Zizek uses the archetype of the Puppet as that ideal-Image which each human has of itself, as if pulling itself forward by means of a string attached to these ideal-Images.

possibility of the redemption of humanity by the purely human. In The Puppet and the Dwarf Zizek draws upon the rather unlikely figure of G. K. Chesterton and his book Orthodoxy (1908) to illustrate his belief that "the irrationalism of the late nineteenth century was the necessary consequence of the Enlightenment rational-Review Essay:

Iowa Journal of Cultural Studies

While The Puppet and the Dwarf finds Žižek admiring G.K. Chesterston's "conceptual matrix - that of asserting the truly subversive, even revolutionary, character of orthodoxy" (35) he deploys the conservative Catholic thinker's ideas in order to oppose the logic and the values - of postmodern permissiveness and "ordained transgression" (36) - that fuel hyper-capitalism.
